

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

Sequoyah Hills Presbyterian Church
Knoxville, Tennessee
Dr. Jay Howell
August 30, 2020

“Falling Short: Grace at Rock Bottom”
John 8:2-11

For this whole series “Falling Short,” we’re taking a look not only at the certainty with which we will fall short in all the expectations that are set before us, whether they’re religious or social or familial or professional or whatever, and how grace not only frees us from feeling bound to those expectations, but also how grace sends us forward and redeems the very work we do, redirects it, gives it purpose, or rather gives it the proper purpose, the right purpose. Last week we looked at how this “rich young man” in Matthew 19 had, it appears, been so accustomed to being able to achieve whatever goal that was set before him that when the only answer was grace, that is, something he couldn’t himself earn, it made him sad. We talked about how there are two claims about the love of God, and how for every person, one of them bothers us more. The first: “There is nothing you can do to make God love you more.” And that was where the rich young man fell: no matter what he did, no matter what he was able to achieve, there was nothing he could do with all his ability, all his resources, all his will that could bring him more into God’s favor. And we talked last week about how many of us fall in that category: that it bothers us to think that we can’t get ahead in the ways of God just by our own effort and talent or innate worth.

But then this week, we’ll look at the second half of it, the one that says, “There is nothing you can do that would make God love you less.” For some of us, that really doesn’t sit well, whether it’s for ourselves, or for someone we know. Will you pray with me?

Holy God, for the Word spoken and heard today, may it not be mine but yours.
Amen.

Some of you may have heard this story in Scripture before, or at the very least many of you may be familiar with what is probably the most well-known verse from this story. I’m talking about v. 7, Jesus’s poignant response and challenge to the scribes and Pharisees, “Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her,” or in many circles phrased, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone.” That teaching is often held up as this hallmark, this caution against casting judgment against another person. And that’s a very good thing to hold up, that we shouldn’t be so quick to condemn someone else while we ourselves aren’t exactly in a state of pristine purity.

But as well-known and as right as that teaching is, “Let anyone without sin cast the first stone,” sure doesn’t stop us sometimes, does it? I mean sure there’s the impolite way to go about it, and that’s just the straight-up condemnation of another person for something they did—that’s one way—but socially that can come across as sanctimonious or self-righteous. It’s frowned upon, so we don’t really do anything that overt. But what we will do is silently think to ourselves, gosh I’m glad I’m not like them.

There’s an old Jeff Foxworthy joke—some of y’all know Jeff Foxworthy right? Of the “You might be a redneck” fame. Comedian whose biggest catchphrase was a series of one-liners

helping folks determine whether you were a redneck. For example, “If an episode of Walker, Texas Ranger changed your life, you might be a redneck.” And if you’ve ever listened to one of his stand-ups, he’ll go on for a while on how to tell if you’re a redneck or not. It’s all in good fun, and some of them you hear and you think, “Whew, well, definitely not me.” But then for others like, “If you’ve ever had a working television sitting on top of your non-working television,” might hit a bit close to home. Or even, “If you’ve ever opened a beer during a eulogy, you might be a redneck.”

Y’all get the point. Foxworthy lifts up these absurd situations, and for most of them, it’s more, “That’s just ridiculous, and it’s kind of funny.” And I’m not taking a dig at Jeff Foxworthy. It’s all in good fun. He’s a man of faith himself too for that matter. But it’s not hard, if you’re not careful, to slip into thinking that you’re glad you’re not like the folks he’s describing.

For example, in one bit, he’s talking about his dysfunctional family and strange relatives, but then he adds, just as a point of reassurance, “If you ever start feeling like you have the goofiest, craziest, most dysfunctional family in the world” and for some of us, that’s what it feels like, right? “all you have to do is go to a state fair. Because five minutes at the fair, you’ll be going, ‘You know, we’re alright. We are dang near royalty.’” And then he goes on to describe some of the strange characters you might run into at a state fair. Point being, by comparison to those odd folks, you’re doing okay. You feel pretty good about yourself.

Again, I’m not knocking Foxworthy. I just think he’s tapping into something that many of us can slip into: that game of comparison, or thinking to ourselves, “Well, at least I’m not like them.”

That is something of the game that is being played here in this passage by the scribes and Pharisees when they bring a woman before Jesus in the temple court. This woman, the text tells us in v. 4, had been caught in the act of adultery. Interestingly they don’t bring the other party as well, since presumably if she had been caught, there was someone else there as well, and it makes you wonder, “Hmm, why did they only drag her out into the temple court and bring only her to Jesus?”

Well, they kind of show their cards in what they do next. They say to Jesus, “Teacher, this woman was caught in the very act of committing adultery. Now in the law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?” Never mind that that’s a really selective reading of Jewish law to say that, namely that it conveniently ignores that both parties should be judged so, but what they wanted to do was trap Jesus between either being cruel to this woman or lax on the law. Jesus quickly diffuses the situation, upholding the law but also challenging these hypocrites by saying those words you might already be familiar with, “Let anyone who is without sin cast the first stone.” At that challenge, they all walk away, leaving Jesus and the woman in the temple court.

When we read this story, we typically put ourselves into one of two places. The first place is in the place of the woman, the one caught in the act of adultery. And the second is in the place of the Pharisees. Did you notice a funny thing about the woman throughout almost the entire story? We don’t hear from her at all until the end. She’s dragged out by the scribes and Pharisees, placed before Jesus and before the crowd he was teaching, her sin announced publicly, and we don’t hear from her at all until everyone else has left. The scribes and Pharisees are using her as a prop to try to trap Jesus. They’re not seeking justice or adherence to the law. Their motives aren’t pure, to say the least, but their motives don’t change the fact that this woman had erred. She’s silent nearly the entire time, and I think it’s safe to say that in this public

humiliation, skewed though her accusers' motives were, she was feeling lower than low and just wanted to disappear.

A friend of mine had endured something similar. I can't name specifics, but this friend had also made his share of mistakes, abusive behavior toward women, substance abuse, alienating friends and family, and at one point, when he felt he had hit rock bottom, as the saying goes, he confided that he didn't see how anyone could love him again, that all that he had done had disqualified him from ever being loved. You know what he had forgotten, or had just not been shown or told? That no matter what he had done, no matter how many he had wronged, no matter how many bridges had been burned, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

He was looking for some kind of word of comfort, some word of affirmation, but at the time I could not give it. You see, when he had shared with me some of the things he had done, it made my blood boil, to the point that when I could easily see that he was in emotional and spiritual pain, I thought, well he deserves it. What he's done is horrible. And I remember thinking, I may have my problems, but at least I'm not like him.

And you know what I forgot in that exchange, what I had completely lost sight of? No matter how much I disapproved of what he had done, no matter how enraged his wrongs may have made me, there was nothing he could do to make God love him less.

That's how we work sometimes, isn't it? We either think that we ourselves are so far gone that we are beyond saving, that we are a lost cause, or we think that about somebody else. And for those of us in that frame of mind, it can be downright scandalous to even suppose that something like grace exists for those who have fallen short.

But such is the promise of falling short: that a day comes when we are faced with our failure and we think, how could anyone accept us now, how could anyone love us now? And to that our Lord says, as he did to the woman in the temple court, "Neither do I condemn you."

That's what our response to anyone else should be too, but too often, when we're on the other side of it, we think like the Pharisees, "You've done wrong. You should feel bad. At least I'm not like you." We don't think of another person in terms of, "There is nothing they could do to make God love them less."

So much of this series is obviously about falling short, about what we do about failure, about sin, about our shortcomings. And one thing is certain: we will fall short; we will fail in whatever it is we're trying to do, trying to accomplish. Sure we might score some wins here and there, but in the totality of our lives, we will fall short, we will do wrong. And we'll know others who will fail and fall short and do wrong as well.

Too often, though, in the midst of our failings, we will think ourselves and others as beyond reach, used up, unforgivable, and we can barely bear to even look at ourselves in the mirror.

But it is into that world that the good news of our Lord speaks, "Neither do I condemn you." And that word comes not with a glossing over of what has been wronged. Rather it comes with the exhortation to go and sin no more.

But it's also a caution against others of us who may be too eager to write someone off, to use them as a comparison to make ourselves feel better, to puff ourselves better. At least I'm not like them.

But what would change if instead of judgment in our hearts, when we looked at ourselves in the mirror or when we looked upon someone who had truly fallen short, and said, "There is nothing you can do to make God love you less"? Might change a lot. Imagine looking at

someone who had betrayed you in the deepest way and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone who had committed the most heinous crime you can imagine and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at someone whose views, opinions, and actions run completely counter to your own and saying, “There is nothing they can do to make God love them less.” Imagine looking at yourself after the greatest failure of your life and saying, “There is nothing you can do to make God love you less.”

The thing is, no matter who you look at, yourself or someone else, you are looking at someone the Lord loves, you are looking at someone over whom the Lord said, “Neither do I condemn you, now go and sin no more.” If only we looked at ourselves and at others with the same grace, a grace that picks up and sends out, how different would the world look then?

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.